Best Practices

What Parents Can Do to Support Future Employment*

- Believe that - in the right setting, with the right supports - anyone, regardless of the level of disability, can work. Make work an expectation for your child’s future.

- It’s never too early to talk about work. Work is part of being a full member of the family and of the community.

- Give your children age-appropriate responsibilities and tasks. Chores at home build valuable work skills for the future.

- Encourage high expectations at every age, even for children with the most significant disabilities. Let your child know that you believe in their abilities.

- Encourage and support your child’s interests. Interests can lead to employable skills.

- Focus on your child’s strengths. Encourage activities which develop those strengths, not just ones which address challenges.

- Make sure your child has experiences similar to their peers. Many kids start doing paid, part-time work in their neighborhood.

- Teach your young adult that work is part of being an adult. Work and wages will give them more choices and control over their life. Work also builds self-esteem, maturity and important social connections.

- Many students with disabilities have the opportunity for school-provided work experiences. Those opportunities are valuable during their early transition years. Target the experiences to their individualized, unique interests and skills.

- Many students have paid jobs while they are still in school. Students who have regular, paid jobs are much more likely to be employed as adults.

- Most young adults get their first jobs through family connections. Using your social networks is an important and natural role for parents.

Thanks to Bob Wagner for making this information available to the Employment First Coalition.